In my presentation I will discuss the general benefits of learning skills and acquiring tools that are connected with peer-tutoring, as well as the general impact that this learning method can have.

My focus will be on the Peer-EDU program that is currently happening as a collaborative initiative between University of Gdańsk, Malta and Split that I am able to take part in.

I will discuss the programme and what we have learnt, as well as talk about peer-tutoring in general. My presentation will concern not only the direct benefits or skills developed because of participation in that programme, but it will also consider how the experience gained from the training can extend beyond the peer-tutoring.

Basing it on my personal experience, but at the same time thinking universally, I will discuss how having this kind of international training experience can impact views on education and collaboration in general. How it can broaden career prospects, enhance one's professional experience, inspire by learning in a diverse environment and even influence the perception of all social relations.
